Re “Alberta’s sovereignty act looks increasingly like a sham” (Nov. 29): Were Danielle Smith not seemingly so intent on poking a stick in the eye of the federal government, she might merely sign on to the green-electricity deadline and proceed to do only as much as is convenient, until the deadline came and went.

This is usually the Canadian way. When has any jurisdiction in Canada met an environmental deadline? Well, at least once: Alberta is well ahead of targets to get off coal, an initiative of Rachel Notley’s NDP government.
